

The Face Of Choice

Charlotte-Mecklenburg's parent choice plan has reshaped the community's schools.

The schools now look more like our neighborhoods – mostly segregated by race and income.

Inside is a look at every school's ethnic makeup as of the 20th day. For choice plan participants, there are few surprises. For other residents of the community that "made busing work," the data may be an eye-opener.

Nearly half the schools would be considered racially segregated by a common definition (pages 6, 7).

Some suburban schools' minorities are mostly in upper grades, a likely result of "grandfathering." Those schools will be less racially balanced in the future.

Most disturbing, statistics for high schools signal a dropout rate that, while lower last year, still consigns thousands of youth to a dismal future, year after year.

Reading the charts: What's involved, what to look for

This week's Educate! may seem daunting. But don't let it be.

And don't assume you should read it from front to back. Proceed as you're probably inclined to do:

Find the name of a school you know and see what you can learn about it. Is it as big as you thought, or bigger? or smaller? Is it overcrowded, or underutilized? Is it racially balanced? Is it stable, or has there been a big increase or decrease since last year, either in overall population or in ratios?

Digging deeper, look at the grade-by-grade report for student groups, first for this year, then at how the African American percentages compare with last year's.

After looking at a school you know, look at another. Compare schools in different parts of town.

Most of the biggest changes in African American ratios came in westside schools that last spring were magnets. Marie G. Davis is an example.

High-minority schools are also generally the ones that are not full. That is for two reasons:

One reason is that parents assigned to them didn't want their children to go there. At least several thousand children were "grandfathered" to remain at their previous school, but CMS has never fully accounted publicly for how many of them are at each school. As they age out, however, the racial ratios at those schools will be changing.

The other reason is that CMS committed to lower class sizes for struggling students, who are now congregated on the west and near east sides of town. At Equity Plus II schools, which are identified in the charts, elementary classes were to be 16 students, not 23 or more, to allow for the additional attention these children need. Capacity numbers were never changed to reflect lower class sizes. Instead, officials said their goal was to have such schools at 70% of capacity. The data suggests that enrollment may put that equity promise in jeopardy at some locations.

Information in this issue is based on enrollment as of the 20th day of school last week. Grade-by-grade enrollment numbers have been converted to percentages for easier reading, and to make possible several of the charts.

For general information, a percentage is given for utilization of each schoolhouse. Of all the numbers in this report, this is the one that may be least reliable. It was determined by dividing total enrollment this fall by the school's capacity, as listed in a July 10, 2002 CMS document on family choice lottery results. The capacity numbers tend to change a lot, as buildings are refurbished or as mobile classrooms are added or removed. But the estimates over the past year have fluctuated widely, as this example for
